Representatives from Kent Police will be attending St Francis Church, Ashford on Thursday 28 August 2014 at 7pm

Kent is home to approximately 1.8 million people, of which almost 12% are from minority ethnic communities speaking over 80 different languages.

Forging relationships, building trust and understanding the issues within Kent's different communities are fundamental for credible policing. Police constables and other officers and staff working within Kent Police are responsible for the protection of life and property, the prevention and detection of crime and the maintenance of public order.

The Gurkha Peace Foundation is a charity which exists not only to champion the rights of Gurkhas and their dependants living in the UK but to foster integration into the communities in which they live. The trustees and executive committee are therefore both pleased and excited to work alongside Kent Police in their efforts and commitment to increase the diverse representation of officers and civilian staff within their workforce.

2015 sees celebrations both in the UK and Nepal to celebrate two hundred years of association between us. A history that is laced with many tales of bravery and Gurkha loyalty.

Kent Police are seeking to recruit officers and civilian staff from as wide a background as possible in order to reflect all of the communities we serve. We are particularly keen to continue to increase representation of minority ethnic officers.
